

This cemetery is situated on a gentle rise of land overlooking the Fraser River. It is across from the eastern half of McMillan Island on Indian Reserve #5. The railroad runs directly beneath the ridge along the river's edge. The highway has cut away about one quarter of the cemetery. It is said that monuments from this area are attached by the side of the highway a bit further along, but we could find no sign of them.

The remaining monuments are in good condition and quite readable. There are some French names, and with the exception of two monuments bearing the name Thomas, the rest are Indian. This is the most interesting cemetery I have seen in BC.

The cemetery is almost completely overgrown with blackberry vines, bracken and tall grass. The open design of the iron crosses blends so completely with the tall grass as to be almost invisible, even at close range. This may be a blessing in disguise, as the crosses are of excellent design, and would likely be taken away by souvenir hunters if clearly visible from the highway. The crosses, some as high as four feet carry a plaque of some base metal at point where the arms join, with the name of decedent (no dates). Although the general air is one of neglect, someone obviously cares, as attempts have been made to keep the grave sites marked and in good repair.

An interesting point is that all of the stone monuments are of a high quality white marble. These are The ones that bear the Indian names. All the French names are on the iron crosses. The marble Monuments have greyed considerably with exposure, but are in good condition. A check of many LFV cemeteries of the same period indicate that marble was expensive and not used often. This would imply that the persons who had these stones erected wanted the very best and was able to pay for them. A check for the stonemason at the lower right hand edge of several stones revealed the names Alex Hamilton. I think a check would probably indicate that he resided in New Westminster.

Two concrete bases - cross broken off and propped against the base. No names. Then,

THOMAS, F. May 28, 1971 home-made wooden marker

The stones above are in situ – and fairly clear of overgrowth. The area towards the river is shoulder high in dried weeds and vines. There are many iron crosses. They have a name only at the point where the cross arms meet.

Together in a row:

Catherine PIERRE Mary Ann PIERRE Lucy PIERRE (smaller duplicate adult cross) Mary PIERRE J. PIERRE Pauline LEO

There are some large stone slabs – probably grave covers, completely covered by moss and earth. Between row tow and towards the entrance, a space of about sixty feet, there are rows of graves. No upright stones remain, but bunches of spring bulbs mark their location. Some are dug with the Earth placed to one side. In this section the following:

> Markers for Elmer and F. Thomas one iron cross held up with a 4x4 one marker gone, but replaced by boulders and a stick marking the site unnamed wooden cross - broken

At the roadside there appear to be the remains of the cemetery entrance gates, half buried in the ground.
