PHOENIX CEMETERY and CENOTAPH (2000), PHOENIX, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Located about 1-2 miles down from the Phoenix Mines on the main road.

The matter of a burial ground for the city of Phoenix was first discussed by the city council in May 1901. The mayor offered to donate a piece of ground for the purpose but apparently it was not suitable as a committee was set up in September to search for a suitable site. In October the health officer was instructed to inspect a proposed cemetery site, and confer with Dr. Jakes of Greenwood. In November the committee reported that they had examined the proposed site about a mile below the city, in company with the city health officer and Dr. Jakes of Greenwood, and all had agreed that it was quite suitable for the purpose. The government was, however, being communicated with in the matter. The report was accepted. Two weeks later the proposition of Mr. J. B. Macaulay for a city cemetery site was accepted, the site having been found satisfactory to the government, and Mr. Macaulay was requested to proceed at once with the cleaning of a part of the site. The first recorded burial was at the end of January 1902.

The site was surveyed in 1905 and the sum of $375 was paid to Mr. J. B. Macaulay on delivery of the deed. In April 1905 plots were offered for sale to the various unions and fraternal bodies. Some deaths were not registered and probably there in no record of the burial. The list is only as complete as we could make it.

Recording done Olive Balsbanor in 1985.

In common with all men at the mine, he had been warned not to enter the chute, because of the danger from ore falling from above. Like many, however, he took chances and went up into the chute, evidently to dislodge some ore. It came down without warning or time for him to escape, and when found a few minutes later McGregor was dead with a piece of rock weighing many hundred pounds pinning him against the walls, his life having evidently been crushed out instantly. It required six men to remove the rock. He had been employed less than a month."
